Although the fourth quarter of 2020 experienced significant lockdowns, many tenants are taking a wait and see approach into 2021. A noticeable trend in 2020 was the request for short-term renewals allowing tenants more time to determine their design and footprint post-COVID-19. Despite limited tenants in the market in the fourth quarter, rental rates have remained steady with no signs of any discount due to COVID-19.

The overall office market saw vacancy of 10.4% in the fourth quarter of 2020; a 80-basis point decrease from one year ago. A large amount of suburban office development and new product coming on stream for 2021 will create a competitive landscape that may impact rental rates and vacancy going forward.

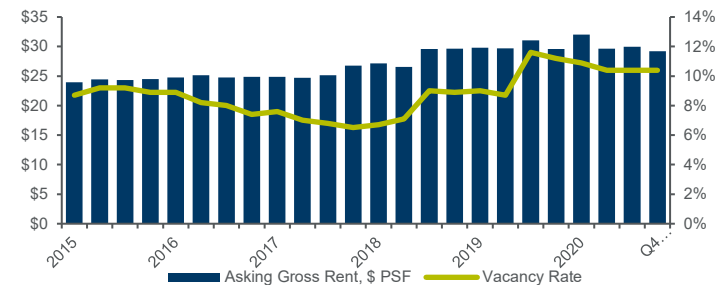

Office sales continued to perform well in the suburban market due to the limited supply. The downtown market currently has over 500,000 square feet of investment office product on the market, which we expect will see stronger activity in early 2021 with the attractive financing options available.

COVID-19 will not end the office environment, rather it will become more dynamic, giving tenants the ability to re-evaluate the way their employees work, enabling them to work in new ways. In certain industries, we expect to see flex-time workplaces throughout 2021. As the vaccine implementation program continues to develop and restrictions start to ease in 2021, tenants will start evaluating their office design and implementing a safe return to work program.
